HEALTH, SAFETY & THE LAW

In Canada, employers and supervisors have health and safety obligations for the employees that work under their direction and for the work area over which they have authority. While these obligations may vary slightly from province to province, they share a common general duty clause: “to take every reasonable precaution to protect the safety of a worker”.

In addition, employers must ensure that they hire competent supervisors who are knowledgeable about workplace processes, hazards existing in the workplace and Occupational Health and Safety Laws that apply to their workplace. Although many supervisors may be familiar with processes in their workplace and with the hazards associated with them, they may not be considered ‘competent’ in terms of their knowledge of and obligations under health and safety laws. The course also covers Bill C-45, now known as Section 217.1 under the Criminal Code of Canada.
